

Fruits of shared labour: the Indian women joining forces for food security

Rural women in Tamil Nadu are mostly excluded from land ownership, but collective farms can offer self-sufficiency

More than 70% of working women in rural India are farmers, but fewer than 13% hold land titles. Photograph: AFP/Getty Global development is supported by

About this content

Anne Pinto-Rodrigues

Tue 13 Oct 2020 07.15 BST

Last modified on Thu 15 Oct 2020 16.52 BST

When all the shops closed due to the coronavirus lockdown, small collectives were key to remaining self-sufficient for marginalised farmers in India's southern state of Tamil Nadu.

“We had sufficient grains and vegetables at home, while others in the village were seeking government support,” says 46-year-old Poongani, one of the widowed Dalit women among the nine members of the Sivanthi Poo farming collective in the village of Thottampatti.

Adhiamal, 60, a Dalit widow who belongs to the Kalanjium farming collective in Sohanur village in the same state, echoes Poongani's satisfaction at being food secure: “No shops in the village were open during the lockdown. We were the only source of vegetables for the villagers.”

The small, informal farming groups that Poongani and Adhiamal belong to are facilitated by the Women's Collective, a grassroots nonprofit in Tamil Nadu. The organisation encourages poor women, who neither own land nor are able to lease land on their own, to pull together and lease land collectively to grow food.

Produce on the farms is split equally, giving members access to nutritional food. Photograph: Women's Collective Sheelu Francis is one of the organisation's founders. "We began with five collective farms in 2010, with the intention of helping landless single or widowed women achieve food security," she says.

Advertisement

In rural India, more than 70% of working women are farmers, yet fewer than 13% hold land titles. Women are often underpaid and exploited, and if they are unmarried, widowed or separated then leasing land is next to impossible. For a woman from a marginalised community like the Dalits – the lowest caste in India's caste hierarchy – not having access to land affects her family's health and nutrition.

"With collective farming, we ensure nutrition and food security for landless women at the household level," says Francis.

The initial success of the collectives led to more women wanting to join. Today, there are 89 collective farms with a total of 695 members spread across Tamil Nadu.

Each collective has between five and 10 members. Women's Collective provides the training, from the choice of crops to producing natural fertilisers. No chemicals are used. Depending on the size of the plot, women grow millet, rice, groundnuts, and a variety of pulses and vegetables. Typically, a third of the harvest is given to the landlord as rent while the members share the rest.

We've rarely had a problem with each other ... if there are disagreements we settle them amicably

Kuppamal

"The produce lasts us about six months," says Poongani, adding that any surplus is sold at the village markets.

Work is shared equally and all decisions are discussed and made with collective agreement. If for any reason one member can't come to work on a particular day, they can choose a family member to substitute them or make up for the lost day at another time.

Kuppamal, 40, belongs to the Kurunji collective in Thottikalai, which has seven members. "In the six years that we've been working together, we've rarely had a problem with each other. If there are any disagreements, we settle them amicably," she says. "We've become closer over the years."

But there have been other challenges, says Francis. "Initially, the farmers would lease land from private landowners. When the landlord saw the rich harvest, they would immediately ask for the land back."

Against the grain: why millet is making a comeback in rural India

Read more

To avoid this, women landowners in the village were identified and invited to join the collective.

Land is also leased from absentee landowners, mainly villagers who have gone to nearby cities like Chennai or Bengaluru for work. The landlord's share of the harvest is sold, and the money deposited in their bank account.

Now landless, married women are also joining collectives. Sandhya from the Avvai collective in Bommanur village, is delighted to be four months pregnant after trying to conceive for more than a decade. She attributes her pregnancy to the nutritious and organic produce she has been eating.

"It's the cultivation and consumption of natural foods that has made this pregnancy possible," she says.

As 2021 begins ...

... we have a small favour to ask. Millions are turning to the Guardian for open, independent, quality news every day, and readers in 180 countries, including India, now support us financially.

We believe everyone deserves access to information that's grounded in science and truth, and analysis rooted in authority and integrity. That's why we made a different choice: to keep our reporting open for all readers, regardless of where they live or what they can afford to pay. This means more people can be better informed, united, and inspired to take meaningful action.

In these perilous times, a truth-seeking global news organisation like the Guardian is essential. We have no shareholders or billionaire owner, meaning our journalism is free from commercial and political influence – this makes us different. When it's never been more important, our independence allows us to fearlessly investigate, challenge and expose those in power.

In a year of unprecedented intersecting crises in 2020, we did just that, with revealing journalism that had real-world impact: the inept handling of the Covid-19 crisis, the Black Lives Matter protests, and the tumultuous US election.

We have enhanced our reputation for urgent, powerful reporting on the climate emergency, and moved to practice what we preach, rejecting advertising from fossil fuel companies, divesting from oil and gas companies and setting a course to achieve net zero emissions by 2030.

If there were ever a time to join us, it is now. Your funding powers our journalism, it protects our independence, and ensures we can remain open for all. You can support us through these challenging economic times and enable real-world impact.

Every contribution, however big or small, makes a real difference for our future. Support the Guardian from as little as $1 – it only takes a minute. Thank you.